

INDIA IN WATERCOLORS

"India is a land so rich in history, culture and physical beauty that a three-week trip demands a return of so many visits," first-time A&K traveller Arthur Goldberg says. "I don't think my life will be long enough to experience India's many varied offerings."

Arthur and his wife did their best when they travelled with A&K on a custom-made journey that included visits to many of India's greatest locations. Throughout their journey, Arthur, an executive in the sign and environmental graphics industry, indulged his passion for painting.

"The connection between what I see and what I feel appears almost like magic upon the page," he says, "and the particular locations influenced how I drew and painted. When I stood on the traffic island in the middle of a busy Chennai street in overwhelming heat and noise, the details flooded my page." Arthur believes that traffic in some ways defines the people. "[They] have the ability to navigate through society, noisily pushing and shoving, but yet doing so within a sense of give and take that has the quality of 'true democracy.'"

He and his wife were most impressed by the overwhelming beauty of the land and people. "The Shore Temple of Mahabalipuram struck me flush in the face when I saw it. The trees on the horizon folding into the temple said, 'You must draw us!' and so, I did."

"With so much to see and hear and feel," Arthur says, "I was inspired to draw and paint practically the entire time I was there." Is another trip in the future? "I'm sure we'll be enjoying A&K's attentive devotion for many trips to come."
